The education of a man is never completed until he dies.

Robert E. Lee
Four years of being shaped, pruned, and cared for has allowed the bonsai to produce the ripe fruit we call seniors. Seniors, after having been given all the knowledge they could absorb, are ready to be picked from the tree. As they leave the school, they will share their richness with the world outside.

The business knowledge acquired has given them at least a basic understanding of all the things an actual business. This isn't the extent of their knowledge, however. They have gained wisdom, both within and outside of the classroom. Some call it the way of life. Babson College prepared them to expand their horizons.
President Sorenson,

For seven years you have given your energies to helping Babson reach its fullest potential. Your persistence in raising money has allowed Babson to expand and improve its facilities and its reputation. You did not do this alone, but your efforts were a prime motivator and catalyst for the college's growth.

The impression you have made here will never fade. The senior class and the Babsonian staff wish to recognize your accomplishments and leadership.

The dedication of this yearbook could go to no one more deserving than you, President Sorenson. Good luck to you always.
