DEDICATION
When a selfless, totally committed man adds to your life a quiet, yet intensely alive, appreciation and desire to know that which is transpiring just outside your present intellectual reach, how do you show your gratitude?

In the world today, filled with the Madison Avenue spawned phraseology of meaningless superlatives, clichés and trite tributes, how can one thank a man for devoting almost three decades to the incessant questioning of students and the art of teaching?

How can one adequately express the pride felt for having known a man of sufficient stature to have made time, in an already over-crowded schedule, to volunteer to teach those adults in the greater Boston area deprived of a skill which we take for granted, the illiterate?

When that man is "Wally" Mors, I believe that the only sincere expression that fits the occasion is "THANK YOU."
